Hi Justine,
Nothing seems quite normal, does it? Every day, life seems to be getting further away from what it was.

For young people who have experienced trauma, this is an especially difficult time. The challenges these lost and forgotten youth face, including depression and anxiety are amplified in times of stress.

This time of year is usually back-to-school time. Now, for reasons we can’t fully control, feelings of excitement and anticipation for the school year ahead are being replaced by fear and uncertainty.

How do these bright but underachieving students re-capture their sense of purpose and re-gain their sense of safety and stability? It takes time, creativity, and you.

With safety measures in place, youth at The Next Door are continuing with their in-person treatment and education, centered on building emotional and life skills. Through relationship building activities, art projects, and more, students learn how to communicate positively, work together, and take steps toward their own success.

These youth make incredible strides every day, but unfortunately, due to the uncertainty of our economy and overall state of our country, the services these young people rely on are at risk of being eliminated.

Every day, we’re all learning how we can be happy and successful despite the uncertainty around us. And every day, these resilient youth are learning that we’re not giving up on them and that, despite what they’ve experienced and the scary things happening in the world, they can enact positive change and find joy.

Show these young people you won’t give up on them. Give a gift of hope today.

With high hopes and gratitude,

Janet L. Hamada, MSW
